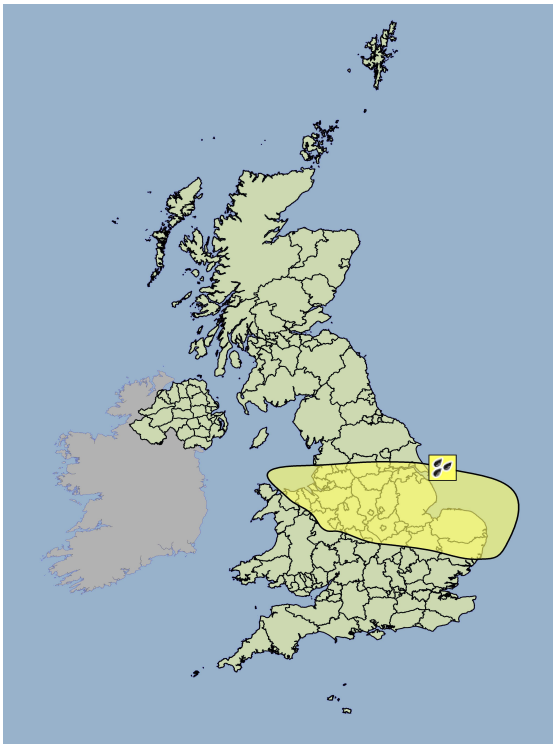
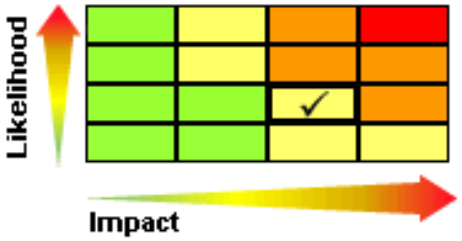
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
Areas of showers that have affected northern England and north Wales during Bank Holiday Monday may merge together during the evening as an area of slightly stronger winds runs into the area from the north. There has been a great deal of variation in the timings and intensity of the resulting area of rain but there is a low likelihood that as these showers combine they could bring some very heavy rainfall to the warning area with perhaps as much as 50 mm falling in a few hours. Much of the warning area is however expected to see much smaller rainfall amounts. As such any disruption from flooding is likely to be localised to where we see the higher rainfall amounts.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 20:00 on Mon, 31st Aug 2015 until 10:00 on Tue, 01st Sep 2015

Showers affecting parts of northern England and north Wales through Monday afternoon may merge together on Monday evening to give a period of more prolonged and at times very heavy rainfall. This will then sink southeastwards through parts of the Midlands and East Anglia overnight and into Tuesday morning.

There is a great deal of uncertainty in these developments with many areas only seeing small amounts of rainfall. Where the heaviest rain falls some localised flooding is possible and the public should be aware of the potential for disruption.
